View from Grabbist August 25

We have a family of herring gulls on our roof - mummy, daddy + three kiddies, with loud squeaks and screeches at all hours! I've never given them too much thought (except when once a gull pinched my ice cream!). Now I have researched them a little... Herring Gulls seem ubiquitous to us only because they have migrated into towns due to habitat erosion and other human factors (such as over-fishing). While not endangered, overall numbers are nonetheless reducing and there are efforts to conserve them. Herring Gulls often mate for life. Chicks hatch in June and will have fledged by August (the leaving do is in my diary!). Parents feed them by regurgitating the wide variety of food they catch. Juveniles don't lose their brown feathers for a couple of years and then go on to live to around 20.

And (oh dear 🙄), the parents often return to the same nesting sites.....!

Pondering these fascinating creatures has got me thinking.....

It is so easy to not give common creatures a second thought. Yet when we do, we discover wondrous beings all around us, as I have with these feisty feathered friends. In fact, we are surrounded by wonder in every moment of every day, from the breath we breathe to the water we drink to our fellow-creatures and fellow-humans.

Secondly, our future or fate is tied up with the gulls - if these resilient birds are being reduced in number by humans, how much more other endangered species!? What does this mean for all our futures? Our rampaging over the rest of nature is self-destruction. We need to reckon properly with how we have considered 'the environment' and 'nature' objects 'out there' to master rather than relating to them gently, with awe, subject to subject. Nothing is 'out there': all of us, humans and non-humans, are inextricably entangled together. In this, we glimpse the Sacred!

Thirdly, if we take this seriously, we must accept the inconvenience. The sleepless night. The imposition. The brazenness of gulls nesting on my roof (how rude!). Or the gall of those whose trauma impinges on our comforts, be they other creatures, local folk or refugees. If we take seriously that we all belong to one another, we will learn to find the grace to accept the imposition, or rather, our essential entanglement - and to share in one another's sufferings.

'Look at the birds of the air' said Jesus (who, by the way, said much more about nature than he did about abstract religious beliefs!). Well, I've been listening to the birds every night recently. And despite the inconvenience, they have strangely warmed my heart.

All this got me thinking: what else, in our times, are we reckoning with?

And how are we invited to respond, to resonate, to reconcile?

However inconvenient, if we listen deeply, this may just involve wonders we have never before considered.

It may just be the kingdom of heaven - right before us!
